

The markets were mixed last week with the DJIA posting a small increase while the S&P 500 fell 0.71%¹. Inflation and long-term bond yields rose on renewed concerns about inflation, although the Fed believes these to be short-lived. Existing home sales were up 23.7% over January of 2020 as inventory ran short sending price up 14.1% from the same period last year², Wednesday of this week will see the report on new home sales. The Philly Fed noted their manufacturing index fell to 23.1 from 26.5 in January (economists were expecting a reading of 19.2), however any figure above 0 points to expansion³.

After an extremely cold week, one that extended into Texas and other southern states, temps appear to be heading north as above freezing highs are on horizon. I just bought a pair of battery powered heated gloves to use when clearing snow at the house, so.....I believe, now that I am prepared for more cold and snow, we won't be seeing any. You are welcome for that.

In this week's recap: Accommodative Fed policies lead to inflation concerns.

Weekly Economic Update

Presented by Charles D. Vercellone, ChFC, February 22, 2021

THE WEEK ON WALL STREET

Rising bond yields dampened investor enthusiasm for high-multiple growth companies last week, sending market averages mostly lower in a holiday-shortened week of trading.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 0.11% for the week. But the Standard & Poor's 500 fell 0.71% and the Nasdaq Composite index slid 1.57%. The MSCI EAFE index, which tracks developed overseas stock markets, declined 0.26%.^{1,2,3}

MIXED SIGNALS

The 10-year Treasury Note yield hit its highest level in a year last week on worries of a pick-up in inflation, while the 30-year Treasury Bond yield ticked over 2.0%. Rising yields weighed on the high-valuation growth stocks, most specifically the big tech names, in addition to dragging down interest rate sensitive sectors, like utilities and real estate investment trusts (REITs).⁴

Economic data painted a mixed picture of the economy. Jobless claims reflected a still-struggling labor market while a strong retail sales number and an above-consensus PPI (Producer Price Index) reflected strong consumer spending and building inflationary pressures.^{5,6,7}

Stocks were flat as the week came to a close, as traders wrestled with the crosscurrents of positive economic data and a further rise in yields.

INFLATION WORRIES

After a long period of low inflation, concerns are growing that higher consumer prices may return as a result of an accommodative Federal Reserve monetary policy and fiscal spending in response to the pandemic. Tensions heightened last week with the release of January's PPI report, which saw a jump of 1.7%, the biggest monthly increase since 2009.⁸

While the Fed believes that any price increases will be fleeting, the market appears to view inflation a bit differently. The prospect of further stimulus and more reopenings are adding to investors' unease, which may revive an old Wall Street practice—inflation watching.
