In pandemic school year, special education gets renewed scrutiny

Serving close to 200,000 students with a wide range of disabilities and needs, New Jersey's special education system is getting a lot of new attention — and likely funding — from Trenton. They come as the Murphy administration and the Legislature look to expand services and capacity in the wake of the pandemic.

'Predictably Irrational' Author Says People Often Underestimate How Much Their Dream Retirement Will Cost. Here's The Real Number

Retiring doesn't automatically mean you will spend less money. People often underestimate how much their ideal retirement will cost, according to author Dan Ariely, a professor of behavioral economics at Duke University. Watch this video to learn how much people actually would need and how to start saving more for retirement.

Making Trusts for Special Needs Children

If you are the parent of a person with special needs, you're well aware the role you play is very different than it may be for other children. Properly planning to meet their financial needs, both in the immediate and long term, is a critical part of supporting your child. This support often must continue well past the typical age of adulthood, which means parents need to put in place financial tools to care for their children in the event of the parents' death.
