The New York Stock Exchange Composite Index continues to trend sideways underneath a significant level of resistance.

The S&P 500 Composite Index has faced similar resistance over the last five months but has recently popped above that resistance line. At this point, I don't consider this a decisive breakout. However, it won't take much more upward momentum to do so, which would be positive for large-cap stocks and the market as a whole.

The Russell 2000 Index has been trending up but that uptrend has weakened over the last month. It is now bumping up against resistance marked by the June and July highs.

The three charts above are the same three charts I presented a week ago. Generally, not much has changed over the past week although the small breakout of the S&P 500 Composite Index is encouraging.

Not much has changed with the RGB Capital Group models over the last month and they remain near the breakeven mark for the month of July.
