Different types of investments involve varying degrees of risk, and there can be no assurance that the future performance of any specific investment, investment strategy, or product, or any non-investment related content, made reference to directly or indirectly in this broadcast will be profitable, equal any corresponding indicated historical performance level(s), be suitable for your portfolio or individual situation, or prove successful.

Direct Participation Programs (DPP) are risky, illiquid investments. While the risk is limited to the amount invested, all of the money is at risk. Furthermore, the transfer of DPP units is usually restricted by contract, especially for private placement units. DPPs are difficult to sell because of their uncertain value, the small market for them, and the large spread between bid and ask prices due to their illiquidity. These investments are suitable for those investors who have long-term investment goals, who will not need the money during the term of the investment, and are willing to risk the entire amount invested. Some DPPs may also require additional amounts later as the need arises, and so the DPP investor will need to be able to make the additional investments when required. DPPs have stringent suitability requirements which are listed in the prospectus. Typically, these are only suitable for individuals with high income and net worth and are considered accredited. Past performance is not indicative of future results.
